Jesse Lynch Williams' candid exposition and discussion of the marriage problem in his new novel, "The Married Life of the Frederic Carrolls," has caught public attention to such an extent that its first edition was sold out within a week of publication—and this although it appeared under two hand-caps. In the first place it was published for the season, and at first, in many cases, refused to handle it. In the second place a gr at many people refused to regard it as fiction at all. They judged from its title that Mr. Frederic Carroll was perhaps a lesser celebrity than Robert Browning, but his married life had been written up in the same way that Browning's might have been—"The Married Life of the Robert Brownings." "Who was Frederic Carroll?" became a tiresome question to book-clerks. Yet the book gained in the face of these impediments. Dealers had to get it, and readers wanted to. The reason is that with-out exaggeration or morbidness, cynicism, but with sincerity, optimism, insight and great humor, it deals with the most interesting "problem" of all—the problems—that of marriage—and yet is first and last a novel; indeed, though the hero and heroine are married at the start, it is first and last a love story.

Houghton Mifflin Co. announce for spring publication an authoritative work on "The Origin and Growth of American Constitution," by Hannis Taylor. Professor Taylor has an international reputation as the author of "The Origin and Growth of the English Constitution." He recently discovered the Pelatiah Webster pamphlet, undoubtedly the source of our constitution.

After an absence in Europe of nearly a generation, Timothy Cole has returned to his native land to continue his life work on American soil. During his sojourn across the seas he has engraved on wood for the pages of The Century Magazine nearly three hundred of the masterpieces of the European galleries, and thus has placed to his credit a distinction enjoyed by no other master of the graver in our generation.

John Trotwood Moore, the Tennessee author whose best known books are "A Summer Hymnal" and "The Bishop of Cottonwood," is a great lover of the horse and his forthcoming book, "The Gift of the Grass," is in reality the autobiography of a famous pacer, Hal Pointer. Mr. Moore believes that great horses are like great men: they achieve greatness because greatness is born in them. He therefore dedicates "The Gift of the Grass" to the four famous champion pacers of their day: Little Brown Jug, 2:11 1/4, Hal Pointer, 2:04 1/2, Brown Hal, 2:12 1/2, and Star Pointer, 1:59 1/4—an immortal quartet of unbeaten Hals. Mr. Moore is a resident of Nashville, where he has until recently been editor of the Taylor-Trotwood Magazine.

Four years ago one of our most successful teachers of European history, Professor J. H. Robinson, of Columbia University, urged the speedy translation of Aulard's well known history, which had been published in 1901. This has now been done; and as a result the English speaking public, hitherto largely fed on Carlyle's rhetoric, will be able to obtain a saner view of the course of political events during this momentous social upheaval. Aulard is the head of a vigorous school of research, which, during the past thirty years, has been busily investigating every nook and corner of this period. He himself has lectured on this subject at the Sorbonne, has edited a magazine, "La Revolution Francaise," especially devoted to its study, has published a mass of original documents relating to the Jacobin club and to the committee of public safety, and has written a host of detailed essays and monographs on various phases of its course. The four volume "French Revolution: A Political History," just published in English by Charles Scribner's Sons, is to some extent a synthesis of his preceding detailed investigations.

It is interesting to study the evolution of the popular novelist. It would be a good subject for some literary critic to pursue to the end. In general there are several big steps in this evolution. First of all the novelist must gain his public and to do this there is only one means—interest. So we see in glancing back over the career of any one of our most widely read novelists that no matter what they are read for now they were originally taken up by the public because of the quality of interest. Take James Lane Allen for example. He first got his audience by appealing to their imaginations, by fostering that instinct in every cultivated mind to follow the adventures or life story of some other being. But—once the audience is assured—how does the author hold it? In several ways, it would seem. One way is to endeavor in each book to outdo the last in ingenuity of plot, to make the "story" not only the main but the sole object of concern. But now and again there comes a novelist who bends all his energies toward filling his book with wisdom and thought and the underlying principles of life. Writers of this class, if must be generally admitted, are the greatest—through their work and theirs only is the real spirit of the age revealed.

The New theater, New York, announces that on Monday evening, January 30 it will present for the first time in America, "The Piper," the play by Josephine Preston Peabody which won the $1,500 Stratford prize and which was presented some months ago at the English festival under the direction of F. C. Benson. The play is in four acts and is written in blank verse. The presentation will be made by the regular repertoire company with Miss Edith Wynne Matthison in the title role. The story of the play is based on Browning's poem, "The Piper of Hamelin," and includes among the characters a large number of his associates, little vignettes of men he had known sketched in a few lines of subtle and conclusive portraiture. Reminiscence of past impressions and experiences, philosophic speculation, daring psychological conjecture are poured out according to his mood without stint or haste—as only the born letter writer can find energy to do.

"The Japanese Letters of Lafcadio Hearn," edited by Elizabeth Bisland, reveal with striking vividness this shy, super-sensitive "literary monk." These newly discovered letters describe his travels, retail the touching or amusing incidents of the Japanese life about him or discuss the books recently read; they analyze the condition of public affairs (some of his political predictions have been curiously verified), the trend of education, the characters of his associates, little vignettes of men he had known sketched in a few lines of subtle and conclusive portraiture. Reminiscence of past impressions and experiences, philosophic speculation, daring psychological conjecture are poured out according to his mood without stint or haste—as only the born letter writer can find energy to do.

It is announced that E. Phillips Oppenheim has made a departure in his forthcoming novel, "Berenice," and instead of a story of mystery and international intrigue he has written a narrative dealing with the love of an English writer, possessing high ideals, for a prominent actress. The story is said to contain many unusual situations and Mr. Oppenheim's many American admirers are awaiting "Berenice" with the greatest interest.

Herbert W. Paul, the well known author of "The Life of Proude," etc., has brought together in a volume called "Famous Speeches" a large number of the most notable speeches delivered in parliament or elsewhere from the time of Oliver Cromwell to Gladstone, Burke, Fox, Chatham, Pitt, Sheridan, O'Connell, Grattan, Cobden, Beaconsfield, Bright and Abraham Lincoln are included. Mr. Paul supplies a general introduction, full biographical introduction to each speech, notes, etc. Little, Brown & Co. are publishing "Famous Speeches" in this country.

A new general magazine to be the "National Post" has just been announced. The magazine will be published semi-monthly in New York. It is to be guided in its career by five men, Mr. E. Garrison, an expert accountant and the author of "Accounting Every Business Man Should Know," published by Doubleday, Page & Co.; Mr. David G. Evans, Mr. Samuel Merwin, both formerly with "Success," Nathan A. Smythe, and Amos Pinchot, a brother of the ex-chief for-
